Three theories according to Mr. R. D. Idham, have been advanced to account for the occasional formation of ice at the bottominstead of our top of attenue of reputing water. The first theory, published in 1816, supposes ground for to be due to the presence in the incold water of minute prystals, which are carried to the bottom by the eddies and there collected by the groups and weeds and anited in a tangled mass of spongy loa. I his theory has been almos: nompletaly overlooked. The spindard ecoonut d pround its was published by Arago is 1833. when the reality of the phenomenon was denied by natural philosophers, and he suggested that, owing to the swiris and eddies of the current, the whole body of the stream was reduced to freezing temperature, the stones and weeds on the bottom then serving as muclei on which the for orystals tright form. This theory is usually given in text-books, as is also one of a year or two later that is often preferred. The third theory explains that ground-iso-is due to loss of heat by radiation from the stones on the bottom, which are thus cooled below freezing temperature and so give rise to the growth of ice crystals lu a manuer analogous to the formation of Boar frost. mir Oldbani flode it probable that the early idea; so lung and strangely neglected is the correct out.
